XsunX, Inc. announced today that the design of its mass production systems for the manufacture of its proprietary Power Glass photovoltaic "PV" films will provide for modular expansion capabilities.

The system design will provide for production capacities of as little as 1 megawatt annually while maintaining expansion capabilities, allowing manufacturers to ramp up to meet increasing production requirements incrementally through 20 megawatts or more. The Company believes that this modular approach may best suit the needs of manufacturers and their markets as the demand for building integrated PV increases.

The core design is based on a patented multi-chamber cluster tool approach using cassettes to control or handle rolls of thin plastic films. The rolls of material (transparent plastic films) are loaded into the cassettes and robotically moved between chambers or stations. Layers of transparent semiconductor and conducting materials are deposited onto the plastics in a manner which prevents cross contamination between chambers to achieve high performance, semi-transparent, large area solar cell devices. The system design allows for co-joining of cluster tool systems and hence, increased output, which can be a limiting factor in conventional in-line systems.

The modular cluster design may also provide manufacturers additional advantages such as reduced facility costs due to the smaller footprint size of systems, added redundancy allowing production throughput to continue even when a processing chamber fails, reductions in material costs through the use of inexpensive plastics, and the reduction of processing gases which further reduces material costs.
