Excerpt from video message to NYSE Euronext employees from CEO Duncan Niederauer:

On the merger front, we are exactly where I would have hoped we would have been when we announced this deal several months ago. Both shareholders, as you know have overwhelmingly approved the deal and the news from late this week was that on the DB side after clearing the 75% threshold in time and on the first deadline we are now able to announce this week that more than 95% of the outstanding shares of DB have tendered in favor of the merger, so a very, very big vote of confidence. From here on out it's about the regulatory process. It's about the integration process and both of those are on or ahead of schedule. Many of you probably saw the note we put out yesterday about the news we got from the competition commission in Brussels as expected right on time, end of phase one, 25 business days, we now kick off the phase two review which is 90 business days. Their statement was consistent with what we would have expected, and it now, in my mind, the easiest visual I've got, is it narrows the funnel so now with all the information we've sent them, all the information they've collected, they're now effectively telling us "hey guys, for the next 90 days, focus on these issues, these are where are our major concerns lie." And it makes our task . . . it's still significant, but it's certainly makes it easier from here on out.

As I said, I stopped in Frankfurt after the Town Hall in London – a full day of meetings in Frankfurt, largely around the integration process; that is beginning to move along very well. Andrew and Jens Hachmeister, who is his equivalent on the other side, is doing a great job. I met with them, I met with some of the members of their team, I met with some members of management, and everything is moving along quite well there. More news to come on that as we outline some of the timelines for things like the operating model, the clearing platform decision, the training platform decision, etc., so expect to hear more from me on that in the coming weeks. But, all in all, that's in good shape.
