Markets have their say on NYSE Euronext-Deutsche Börse tie-up

Clients and competitors have until Monday to respond to a questionnaire from Brussels

Executives at NYSE Euronext and Deutsche Börse are most likely holding their breath. Last Thursday they submitted their initial proposed concessions to the European Commission [in the run-up to their merger], and Brussels has just launched a test phase targeting market participants -- a questionnaire sent to clients and competitors that is to be returned on Monday. Some analysts sound skeptical. NYSE Euronext and Deutsche Börse have agreed to sell off part of their overlapping operations in equity derivatives to a third party: Deutsche Börse, for example, will divest its activities in equity options, where the main market is NYSE Euronext Paris. "We think this first proposal will be seen as too limited, and that open access to Euroex Clearing (editor's note: the clearing house operated by Deutsche Börse) will probably become obligatory in the future [revised] version of MiFID. As a result, the Commission is unlikely to be entirely appeased," say analysts at Barclays. So for them, more concessions could well be necessary. The proposed divestments represent only a small share of trade volumes on Eurex/Liffe -- just 9%. And options and futures activities account for only 2% of Deutsche Börse's revenues, for example.

“Sell overlapping activities”

“The Commission is not insisting that efforts at our end be punitive. That is not the idea,” says Dominique Cerutti, no. 2 at NYSE Euronext. “The point is to sell overlapping activities in areas where we were direct competitors, so as not to reduce competition in the market,” he explains. “And that is what we are offering to do.”

“For our rivals, the advantage of our offer of open and non-discriminatory access to Eurex Clearing for all competitors prepared to innovate in derivatives, is that they would be able to manage collateral for all open positions, and thus reduce their capital cost by allowing margin calls on consolidated positions only,” says Cerutti. Yet for one market participant “Genuine opening would have given users the option of clearing operations on Eurex/ILiffe through other clearing houses.” One issue addressed in the questionnaire is the obligation to respect a correlation with existing derivatives of less than 85% -- the threshold set by the two potential partners -- to take advantage of this access to Eurex Clearing and its impact on the introduction of new products. But NYSE Euronext is taking an optimistic view. And Dominique Cerutti hopes that when the time to decide comes, the appeal to European unity will carry the day. “NYSE Euronext-Deutsche Börse may be the last opportunity to build the world’s largest regulated market -- a European champion capable of staying the course alongside world leaders.”
